1607):.Q: Security and encryption topic in Android i'm trying to create an application that needs security and encryption ability. i try search info on google, but this one is becoming more and more complex. in java, i use AES to encrypt/decrypt an user password. but i couldnt find how to do the same in Android with some third party library. if you know any library that can help or any link to some topic that could help me a bit i would really appreciate! A: There is no general-purpose encryption or decryption on Android.

However, you are talking about encryption on the server, so someone correct me if I'm wrong, but in Android you should be able to use SSL, which is a more general purpose encryption protocol. But there is no way to decrypt the encrypted data on the server so the entire point of SSL (so called Client Certificates) is to get a secure transport using SSL by storing the certificate in the users device and presenting it to the server during the encrypted connection.

Also in Android, you may use key-store to store the user's password and use it on the server. And remember that you will need to get the users password first, so I assume you will store this in the database in the server (I'm not quite sure how you are doing that). As a side note, please remember that the goal of key-stores on Android is to have a unique device certificate which allows the device to decrypt data it received from the server. Key-stores are meant for Android and not for the server. Hope it helps. For more information, there are some related topics on SO: Implementing
