I'm a web developer and I've just joined a new iPhone development team and am trying to understand the difference between using Interface Builder and code. I'm creating a very simple app that when the user selects a row in a table view controller they get directed to a new view controller (it's a vacation itinerary and the user must pay for their holiday). When I create a new view controller in my storyboard I see that I have 6 options in the accessory view: It sounds like this would be great for e.g. choosing destinations in a holiday, or even for one of the edit views used in an Address Book type of app. However, when I create the ViewController in code it's just got a basic view, no options in the accessory view. The view is the same in both cases and I can't find any answers or documentation on the differences here. A: Normally you would use the delegate pattern for a segue. That way you will have the ability to detect if the user has left the view or not. Using a push segue takes advantage of this pattern. The user can just select a row and be transferred to the new view controller. The new view controller is pushed onto the navigation stack, instead of a modal segue being used.
