What's new:

VAMP3 (encoded by VAMP7) mediated T-cell regulation in the absence of LFA-1 in autoimmune disease. The neuropeptide receptor GPR37/A2, encoded by GPR37, is the retinal photoreceptor specific receptor that responds to the neurotransmitter 11-cis-retinal and to autocrine binding of all-trans retinal. This receptor is localized to the cell membrane in many tissues, and its ligand GPR37 is expressed in cardiac muscle, but its function is unclear. We determined the structure and expression of the murine orthologue of GPR37 and its mouse and human orthologues, VAMP7 and VAMP3, respectively. We report the association of this gene with a range of autoimmune diseases, and we demonstrate that VAMP3 is significantly down-regulated in autoimmune diabetes and various experimental encephalomyelitis models, and that this regulation involves mechanisms distinct from those observed for VAMP7. Finally, we describe a causal role for human VAMP3 in progressive lateral sclerosis (PLS), and we identify this gene as a susceptibility locus for PLS.

Synthesis and PL measurements of the imidazolium core of the imidazolium ionic liquid; imidazolium-2-glyoxylic acid with purple and orange forms. Both imidazolium salts of glyoxylic acid, namely, Nmethylimidazolium-2-glyoxylic acid with purple and orange forms have been synthesized and characterized, and their photophysical properties have been examined by steady-state emission and transient absorption measurements. Two isomers with similar chromophores but with different structures have been used to examine PL response of a cationic core in a cationic liquid. Such analysis suggests that the imidazolium moiety produces intersystem crossing from 3-MLCT (or its isomer) to 3-MLCT (and/or its isomer) and then to 3-LUMO. On the other hand, 3-LUMO is responsible for the PL signal of the latter form. The results are consistent with structure suggested for the imidazolium core but not with an alternative structure including glyoxylate as imidazolium-2-carboxylate. Ring Enhanced direct alcohol dehydrogenation: an alternative to combined Pd/dye systems and Pd/TiO₂ systems. Palladium-based direct alcohol dehydrogenation (ADH) catalyst formulations reported to date suffer from problems such as poor activity, poor selectivity, low stability, etc. with these systems requiring high loading of palladium and entailing significant over-stoichiometric consumption of hydrogen gas. In this work, we report on a new Pd salt-based ADH system (Pd5MeO4) which, using optimized conditions, catalyses the hydrogenative dehydrogenation of alcohols at lower temperature (180 °C). The reaction proceeds with nearly 100% selectivity to the corresponding aldehydes with up to 92% isolated yield, and no traces of unwanted products (CHO). We rationalize the activity of the catalyst system by computational studies on the structure and electronic properties of the complexes in solution of the reaction, and we propose that this process involves a "ring effect" resulting from a statistical distribution of complexes in the
