The purpose of this study was to report a case of large bilateral scaphoid fracture treated by an all-metal implant and to discuss the relative merits and limitations of each of the conventional approaches. We used a universal clamp and a headless compression screw for fixation of a bilateral scaphoid fracture. Cervical flexion is restricted; therefore, a method that does not sacrifice the primary range of motion is preferable. Applicant's earlier U.S. Pat. No. 4,943,133 shows a machine for making paneling or mouldings, comprising an extruder for forming a stem and a pellet or shot of glue, a glue applicator for applying the glue to a moulding board, and a clamping device for clamping a moulding board to an extrusion head, the head preferably being covered with a protective device for applying glue to the moulding board during operation. A drawback of the machine disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 4,943,133 is that the applicator, i.e. the glue gun, is exposed to the board being clamped. When the applicator is not in use, the board must be shielded, e.g. by a shutter. The shutter will prevent dust and dirt from entering the applicator, but it will also restrict the possibility for gluing particularly large boards. Furthermore, the shutter is an additional part of the machine, which means that it will require maintenance. Airbus ZULU The Airbus ZULU, also known as the A330-200, is a long-range widebody twin-engine jet airliner developed and built by Airbus and marketed since 2003 by its German subsidiary, Airbus Deutschland. It is designed to be a direct replacement for the Airbus A330 and competes with the Bombardier CRJ family of regional jet airliners. The first delivery to an airline took place in October 2009. Deliveries began in 2010. Development and design The Airbus ZULU is a longer-range version of the d0c515b9f4
